The results of the Bayesian hierarchical models have typically been presented in the form of maps displaying the mean of the posterior distribution of the relative risk for each municipality.

Identifying Clusters in Bayesian Disease Mapping Craig Anderson, Duncan Lee & Nema Dean Abstract Disease mapping is the eld of spatial epidemiology interested in estimating the spatial pattern in disease risk across n areal units. One aim is to identify units exhibiting elevated disease risks, so that pub-lic health interventions can be made.

We propose a Bayesian approach to multiple testing in disease mapping. This study was motivated by a real example regarding the mortality rate for lung cancer, males, in the Tuscan region (Italy). The data are relative to the period 1995â€“1999 for 287 municipalities.

Focusing on data commonly found in public health databases and clinical settings, Bayesian Disease Mapping: Hierarchical Modeling in Spatial Epidemiology provides an overview of the main areas of Bayesian hierarchical modeling and its application to the geographical analysis of disease.

A Bayesian Model â€¢ A Bayesian model consists of a likelihood and prior distributions â€¢ The product of the likelihood and the prior distributions gives the most important distribution: the posterior distribution â€¢ In Bayesian modeling all the inference about parameters is made from the posterior distribution.

Introduction to Bayesian Mapping Methods

In disease mapping, the Bayesian approach is widely used for forming the prediction interval of relative risks. In this paper we propose a hierarchical-likelihood interval for disease mapping, which...

Prediction interval for disease mapping using hierarchical

The remainder of this paper is organized as follows. Section 2 gives a brief introduction to Bayesian disease mapping, and critiques existing approaches to cluster detection in this context. Section 3 proposes our methodological development, while Section 4 establishes its efficacy via simulation.

Identifying clusters in Bayesian disease mapping

In recent years, disease mapping studies have become a routine application within geographical epidemiology and are typically analysed within a Bayesian hierarchical model formulation. A variety of model formulations for the latent level have been proposed but all come with inherent issues.
