Companies in the United States employ many processes in running their businesses. Laws from various sources affect these processes, so that the processes and administration of them are specialized. When company management does not acknowledge the need for common understanding and for specialization, the results are confusion, subsequent errors, and increased costs.

During the mid-20th century, the philosopher Karl Popper emphasized the criterion of falsifiability to distinguish science from nonscience. Statements, hypotheses, or theories have falsifiability or refutability if there is the inherent possibility that they can be proven false. That is, if it is possible to conceive of an observation or an argument which negates them.
