"Eating People Is Wrong" is a social satire set in academe among the faculty and students of a provincial university in 1950s England. Malcolm Bradbury, who would later become a professor of literature like his protagonist Stuart Treece, took nearly a decade to write the novel, beginning when he was a student and finishing it as a professor.

It's odd that in the afterward to "Eating People Is Wrong" Malcolm Bradbury seems annoyed about the book being perceived as from the same line as "Lucky Jim". One would have thought that having written a modern novel in the 1950s, set in a provincial British university, you'd expect the critics to reach for "Lucky Jim" as a point of reference.
